Having satisfied himself that Piano-Fortes. his imagination was not trifling with him, that gentleman began to make inquiries of the people about his desmesne as to whether any former proprietor of the property, or any other person in any way connected with Castle Blank, had met an untimely end, or disappeared suddenly and mysteriously from the mansion, or if there were any tale of mystery connected with the place; and, there having been none of the kind, the peasantry could only account for their new lord's inquiries on the ground that the traditionary and not all imaginative risks of Irish landlords had begun to effect his reason, and that he was rapidly tending to a demented State of mind. But the delusion was on the part of the people, as the lord of Castle Blank speedily showed one fine morning, by collecting a sufficient num-
